MONDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 3, 1860.

COMMUNICATED. MOONLIGHT ON THE GABOON RIVER,

WEST COAST OF AFRICA. I have just taken a refreshing bath, and now sit down on the hammock netting to enjoy the beauties of the night. A soft balmy breeze steals quietly and gently along, playing with the hair, and with a caressing touch, cooling the brow. Turning toward the shore, the fitful rays of the retiring lamp glimmering from the upper windows of the houses, tell us that the inhabitants are about seeking that repose, that only can be enjoyed in peaceful homes, on shore .-Looking upwards, a few bright stars gaze down upon us, encircling with their twinkling light, the halffull moon. It is the same moon we have all seen long ago, and often, ever changing, and yet always the same .-It is the same moon we have looked upon in our childhood, and wondered what it was, and our parents told us, it was a big world like our own. And when in after life, our first fond attachment impelled us to seek the presence of her, who was dear to our heart, the same moon lighted our footsteps, and shone down upon our mutual happiness .-And now, in this time of wandering, the moon still follows us, making the night beautiful with its presence. It is a pleasant thought, connected with our looking at the moon, that its rays, now resting on us, will also rest on friends at home, and thus, in a manner, unite us.

Meantime, there is a quiet stillness throughout the ship, only broken by the thoughtful tread of the officer on watch, as he silently paces fore and aft. The men, swinging in their hammocks, or here and there stretched upon the deck, sleep heavily after their day's duties, perhaps dreaming of far off homes and friends.

On the outside, the fretful little waves, carried swiftly past, and pitching about as they go the boats fastened to the swinging booms, strike against the sides of the ship, and then fall back again in long balf circular ripples. Further on, the bright reflection of the moon, like a golden road, stretches far across the dark waters. On either side, the little wavelets roll and tumble up to it, and then recede again, as though unwilling to overwhelm and bury it. And this golden pathway, so resplendent in its sparkling brilliancy, seems a fitting one, to receive the tread of Angel Spirits' feet, as they nightly visit earth on missions of

As a reflection, I have often thought we lose much true happiness in this world, be- K and 27th streets, Mr. Colineau, is now manufaccause we are unwilling to use the faculties | turing XX ale and porter and brown stout, all of God has given us, in contemplating the grandeur and sublimity of his works. God is the great Artist, and his pictures are spread out everywhere, all around us, and if we only open our eyes, and consider them, we will find ourselves rewarded by that peaceful quietude, and contented feeling, that constitutes true happiness.
